PIAZZA INSTITUTE
OVERLOOK

A BALCONY FACING WESTWARD, to the fore of a rooftop terrace overlooking the city. Twin streams fed by long aqueducts flanked the tower in an embrace, then split — again in symmetry — to fall in two over the facades of the structure. Behind, paved pathways connected the cardinal points of the circular structure, and at their intersection rose a delicate white tower, starkly contrasting the silhouetted black spires of the horizon.

BENEATH TOWER

THE WIND WHISTLED THROUGH the arcades — a low and mournful hum. At the opposite side of the tower, I could fully behold the western vista; a river stretching out to the horizon, the opposing shore veiled and blurred in fog, receiving long shadows cast from the tower.

Radiating outward from the tower were the roaring falls, glittering in the half-light. They split the circular piazza into two tiers; that lower tier accessible from here by twin descending staircases that curved inward to embrace a small landing. Here, the stairways flattened out and continued, splitting the flow in two to descend towards the outer arcades and the red river.

The entrance to the white tower was here; and dark in the shadow of the waning sun, a black monolith of a door — seamless and with no visible means of admission.

OVERLOOK

BREATH-taking isn't it?" says Salandr , gesturing out over the vista. "Here is the city as I saw it — empty, painted in rust and gold, below tormented skies writhing in cruel fire." she continues, in a tone somewhere between opera and pantomime.

This one is good for those moments when you're torn between reading a book or playing a game. This game is somehow simultaneously text-based and atmospheric, interrupted only by a couple of UI flaws and the constant feeling of disorientation. Maybe the latter was intentional due to the story's content, but still, it would be nice to have "go back" as an option all of the time. Overall, I liked it.
